Dear Mr. Martin:

Others including myself are increasingly aware and concerned over the current issue of net neutrality. I myself am particularly fond of the Internet as is, however as of recently the safety of free enterprise concerning the Internet is at risk.

A man in your position is clearly aware of the arguments concerning net neutrality, so I'll just cut to the point. I personally believe that telecomm corporations should be unable to block applications they do not favour, and in addition should be unable to discriminate between content providers such as websites, services and protocols. I also believe that if you or others were to cave on the topic and disagree with net neutrality (something that would surely reduce incentives to upgrade networks and launch next generation network services) would be a large step to limiting american rights granted to us by the 1st amendment.

Furthermore on a more political standpoint I believe it would be unwise for someone in your position to in effect sell the Internet. Not to sound imposing but it is my understanding that the people of the united states just won't sit with a decision like that, which will as you surely know would put a negative spotlight on yourself.

In closing I would just like to make it clear I respect what you do despite any decision you may make, however I would still like you to make decisions that affect the masses not big business.

Sincerely,

Alex Burgdorf
